First and foremost, creation ex nihilo advances the doctrine that the eternally existing God created the universe out of nothing at all. Furthermore, creation ex nihilo acknowledges that all that exists except God was created by God a finite time ago. Finally, the doctrine of creation ex nihilo rules out the idea that such finite realities as space, time, and matter emanate from the essence of God: creation is neither divine nor a derivative of God's essence.

The doctrine of creation ex nihilo was mostly developed due to the rising pressure of Gnosticism. This view drew a distinction between the God of the Old Testament, the one they believed had created this world, and the God of the New Testament, the one they believed had redeemed this world. The God of the OT was also regarded as a lesser deity than the God of the NT.
